

Random numbers for conformal measures

Manfred Denker

Penn State University

A conformal measure is a probability measure for which the push forward by a measurable transformation is absolutely continuous possessing a differentiable derivative. For such measures we present a least square algorithm to construct random points. It is shown that integrals are computed correctly by these points via Birkhoff averages.